Origin and History

The modern General Laws Committee was first established in December 1901, but its origins date back centuries earlier.

The first traces of a committee system in England date to the reign of Edward I (1272-1307) when committees were formed to consider petitions from the lands of the realm. Arguably, the first true standing committee of Parliament was established during Queen Elizabeth's third Parliament, which on April 7, 1571, formed a standing committee to consider "griefs and petitions." By the early 17th century, it was commonplace to find committees of Parliament for receiving grievances from the different counties, which were then framed into the form of a petition. Once adopted by the lower house, the official grievances were sent to the Lords for concurrence, and in their final form were presented as a petition to the king by the houses jointly. One such committee, during the Parliament of 1610, consisted of the king's Privy Council, the first knight of every shire, all the lawyers of the house, the first burgess of every borough and Sir Edwin Sandys, who was also one of the founders of the Virginia Company of London.

When the Burgess convened the first Assembly on Jamestown Island in 1619 they divided themselves into two committees – one to examine proposals for new laws, and one to propose necessary amendments to existing laws.

While the first recorded reference to a committee for propositions and grievances comes from a clerk's petition in 1677 given the Burgesses's desire for an efficient process for transacting legislative business it should not be surprising that a committee for dealing with grievances was among the earliest developed by the General Assembly. Although refined over time the general procedure called for colonists to go before a magistrate asking the legislature to remedy some evil by law or through a proposed change in existing legislation. Once certified at the local level, the grievance would then be brought to the legislature and referred to the Committee on Propositions and Grievances which would review the petition and, if necessary, make recommendation to the House of Burgesses. From at least 1677 through 1900, the Committee on Propositions and Grievances served Virginians as a means of addressing the complaints of the average citizens on an endless variety of problems.

Historically, the Committee on Propositions and Grievances was one of the most powerful and sought after committees. Past chairmen include Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, Richard Henry Lee, Thomas Nelson, Jr., and Benjamin Harrison to name but a few.

By the start of the 20th Century, the House of Delegates had developed an elaborate committee system featuring 22 standing committees with specific subject-matter jurisdictions, and in December of 1901, the oldest standing committee of the House was renamed the Committee on General Laws.
